John Deere purchases Richton to expand irrigation services

MOLINE, Illinois -- Deere & Company announced today that it has completed the purchase of Richton International Corporation. The transaction closed yesterday after approval by Richton's stockholders. Deere had entered into an agreement to acquire Richton in May 2001.

Richton has two primary lines of business: Century Supply, the nation's largest distributor of landscape irrigation equipment and the Richton Technology Group, two providers of computer hardware, software and systems support. Irrigation equipment sales make up about 80 percent of Richton's total revenues. Deere will combine the Century Supply distribution business with its previously acquired McGinnis Farms business into John Deere Landscapes, Inc.

"Completing this purchase establishes John Deere Landscapes as the clear national leader in the irrigation business," said John Jenkins, president of John Deere's Worldwide Commercial and Consumer Equipment Division. "It solidifies our plan to expand overall service and products to customers in the landscaping and irrigation business." Deere is currently evaluating the strategic options for Richton's information technology groups.

Under the terms of the agreement, stockholders of Richton were entitled to receive either cash or common stock of Deere, depending on stockholders' elections. Deere has been informed by the exchange agent that elections to receive Deere common stock have been made with respect to more than 51 percent of the outstanding shares of Richton common stock and, accordingly, each share with respect to which an election to receive Deere common stock has been made will be converted into 0.9697 of a share of Deere common stock and Richton stockholders who submitted valid elections to convert their shares into cash, and those who did not make an election, will receive $36.1299 in cash for each share.
