Merger Q&A

Will shares of Sears Holdings stock list on the New York Stock Exchange or NASDAQ?

Following the completion of the merger, Sears Holdings plans to list on the NASDAQ, an important step in the branding of the new company.

Sears Holdings' trading symbol and date of first trade will be determined in the near future.

Does Sears Holdings anticipate paying dividends to shareholders?

It is expected that Sears Holdings will not provide a dividend payment to shareholders following the merger. This will allow the company to deploy this cash back into the business, which we hope will increase the rate of return for shareholders through the profitable growth of the company. We believe this will be the most effective way for shareholders to realize the value in their ongoing investment in the combined company.

What does this mean for Sears shareholders who rely on dividend payments for income?

Shareholders who prefer an investment that pays regular dividends have the option to elect cash for their Sears, Roebuck shares, subject to proration, and use the cash they receive to acquire securities that pay a dividend. Alternatively, current Sears shareholders interested in receiving cash on a regular basis do have the option to elect stock in Sears Holdings at the close of the merger, which election is subject to proration. They then can sell the shares they receive over time to continue to generate a cash stream, subject to the amount of their holdings and tax considerations.

Will Eddie Lampert be electing cash or stock for his Sears, Roebuck shares?

ESL Investments, which is controlled by Eddie Lampert and is a substantial shareholder of Sears, has chosen to elect stock for its holding, even if the value of the 0.5 of a share of Sears Holdings stock is worth less than $50 per share. This election enhances the opportunity for other Sears shareholders to receive cash for their shares if they so wish.

How will Sears Holdings benefit investors?

Sears Holdings' strategy is to operate as a more profitable retailer. The combination with Kmart will accelerate Sears growth strategy. Together, Sears and Kmart will have more available resources and the substantial benefit of scale in being a $55 billion company. Sears Holdings will continue to invest in its business, products and people. The combined scale and assets should allow the company to generate higher rates of return for its investors than either company could generate on a stand alone basis.
